Daniel Tchetchik's work »Sunburn« deals with contradictory effects of the Middle Eastern climate on the physical and metaphysical landscape — a sun that warms, nurtures, and comforts, burns, strikes, and scars. It is a personal local story that also aspires to address global issues such as climate change, migration, and dwindling natural resources.

Some of the photographs are literally »sunburned,« as part of the negatives were burned in the severe heat. They symbolize a time that has passed, yet their aesthetics often bear certain similarities to the most advanced digital filters, raising more questions about time and the evolution of imagery.
